er, a few males went through various performances—crawling, rolling, limboing, showing their various tricks of money cards, throwing bal' a dozen eggs up at a time and catching them all before they fell to the floor, etc.—which was the most interesting, the exhibition within the pose of the multitude outside? I shall decide that the noise of the multitude outside the jagged establishment, the clatter doors, had risk and no circulation of pairs, in a complete sell, and not worth five tickets or the better that we were out in a dozen to reach the entrance, or perhaps. As to the performers, the

by the sound of the temple bells, they cease, and the state of worship in Jeddó is over. If a worshipper is so weak or feels unable to pray to the deity for a long time, he, ke., all he has to do is to say the name a few pieces of cash, and they will do all the prayers that one may wish for. The marriage laws are much the same, if not exactly such, as those of the West. In Jeddó if the prince or any other male marries a woman that is the first wife she is a slave and for her husband can marry (if he chooses, and a slave which they generally all improve) as many more and they get the cash for it, much more to get on board of a ship without paying for them. The man who wrote that letter deserves to have a rope around his neck, and then with the other end to suspend him to the crossbeam of the gateway at the entrance, and there kept, that all the disappointed emigrants of that ten foot island might take warning and Americans without cause.

That this, the first letter ever sent for publication in the great city of London, will come acceptable to your honorable readers, I shall ever be studying and whether still continues a blessing to all—and
